Bryan's Possible Chance.

Those who imagine that Bryan is a dead cock in the pit because of his resignation as head of the department of state, which has charge of all foreign relations, will find that in matters political he is still a force and that his following among the Democrats of this country exceeds that of Wilson's.

Bryan, like Roosevelt, has a mind of his own, does his own thinking and is a leader rather than a follower. He is in the public eye today as never before and is undoubtedly the biggest man in the Democratic party. While Bryan may be justly charged with being vainglorious, his whole public life has been marked with honesty and devotion to the principles he advocates and the mistakes, if any, he has made have been of the head and not the heart.

There is no gainsaying the fact that Bryan is a bigger man than any member of the Wilson cabinet and that his resignation means the disintegration of the party of which he has been the head and shoulders since his memorable speech at Chicago which gave him the nomination for president. A man whose long public career, like that of Bryan's, though he may have made mistakes, is not easily eliminated by a political party whose whole life has been characterized by blunders and whose legislative record in 1893 was described by President Cleveland as standing for "party perfidy and party dishonor."

The forced retirement of Bryan from the Wilson cabinet means the retirement of the president from public life at the end of the present term.

Will Not Mislead.

Secretary McAdoo's attempt to throw dust about the emphatic vote of the chamber of commerce of the United States against any federal ship ownership plan will mislead no one. "The referendum," he states, "was so prepared that no vote was taken upon the plan proposed in the last Congress to have the government holding and operating ships, and the government becoming such a stockholder in a private corporation."

What a mild measure this retrospective view makes of the ship purchase bill, says the New York Evening Post. Its much altered provisions were always wrapped in a haze of mystery, but no one before ever thought that its plan for the creation of a holding corporation, in which the government subscribed for a majority of the stock, was tantamount to much less than government operation.

One part of the referendum, moreover, related to a plan which has clear elements of relationship even to that stated by Secretary McAdoo. Asked if they favored government ownership of vessels to be leased to private parties, or companies, 714 commercial bodies answered in the negative, and 54 in the affirmative—a more decisive vote than that against full government purchase and operation. It is clear that these bodies must have felt towards the actual shipping bill as did the New York and other associations of merchants, which sent in protests at the time it was pending. Their heavy vote for a failure to the navigation laws demonstrates the sentiment for repeal of the present onerous shipping legislation.

Lamentable Failure.
One critic of the president makes the point that since the first of August last year, when the European war broke out, no step has been taken by the Democratic administration to make our army and navy stronger by a single man or in any way more efficient. If this is true, it is, even as things stand now, a serious charge against those who are in control of national affairs. And if our foreign relations should become more complicated and trying, this period of warning could well turn out to be disastrous to the administration, to say nothing of the country.—Collier's Weekly.

It is a fair criticism of the Democratic party to say that its general incompetency and inefficiency is not compensated by the wisdom and discernment of President Wilson. The president has the support of the people, first, because he is the president; and second, because in our relations toward the powers of Europe, he is right.

That does not alter the fact that in almost every department of the government and in nearly every important public matter that has come under its control the Democratic party has made a lamentable failure. For the time being, the great war has overshadowed all other matters, and war orders partly compensate for the paralyzing effect of the Democratic tariff. The party cannot rightfully claim and credit for these accidents, while its failure to run the government successfully is something for which it must bear the measure of responsibility.

THE LIGHT THAT FAILED.

Twice in dear old Boston, Mass. The shades of night were falling fast, for the ladies of Boston were changing their gowns for dinner. (See footnote.)

A solitary cyclist, a benighted stranger from Chicago, was pedaling ponderously down Beans boulevard when Ira Dumbell, Boston's next to the oldest inhabitant, courteously attracted his attention by standing in the middle of the boulevard with outstretched arms.

"What's up?" asked the solitary cyclist, reining in his steed. "Why, as to that, the sky, and in fact the complete planetary firmament," replied the native politely. "But I arrested your locomotion to acquaint you with the phenomenon that your beacon has ceased its function."

"Come again?" "I thank you sir. Perhaps I shall. But as I am interested in your illumination, I am stranded in uninitiated oblivion. In other words, the effulgence of your irradiator has evanesced."

Just as the solitary cyclist had his mouth seven-eighths open to call for the man's keepers, a small boy from Philadelphia passing, yelled, "Hey mister, yer lamp's out!"

"It's a wonder you wouldn't a told me that," said the solitary cyclist, proachfully to the native, as he lighted up and pedaled over Ira Dumbell's toes.

STREET FORUMS.

The street speaker in Los Angeles has no longer to resort to the soap box for the slight elevation needed to secure the attention of an audience. The city authorities have recognized the possibility of the street orator as a public good, and made provision for his convenience. Two street platforms have already been erected upon the largest plazas and have been so well received that they are likely to be scattered liberally around the city.

They are known as street forums and are built of concrete. They do not differ much in appearance from the park bench, except that what would be the seat is only eight or ten inches above the ground. As they are seven feet long, two or three persons may occupy one at the same time, which is an advantage in case of religious meetings when one or two singers are sometimes needed to supplement the remarks of the speaker. A wide, low coping around three sides provides a substitute for a table, upon which the speaker may have books or notes. If his enthusiasm render him very emphatic he can relieve it by pounding vigorously upon this coping without fear of injuring it, which is not always the case with an improvised table.

TRAVELETTE

By NIKKAR.
BATON ROUGE.

Baton Rouge, Louisiana, occupies the last headline on the great Mississippi before it winds its way into the Gulf delta country that makes up its lower reaches. When the early French voyagers came this way and pushed into the heart of a continent in search of trade and because of religious zeal, one of them made a camp at the first headland and drove a stake into it that he might tether his boat. The stake remained when the voyager was gone. It was red. Other boats were tied to it and a camp established. Hence is the capital of Louisiana known as Baton Rouge, the "Red Stick."

And today French is not unlikely to be heard in the committee rooms of the high walled capitol building, or where the sugar planters shop in the low celled stores that skirt Main street. The daughters of Baton Rouge are dark and petite because their sires are sons of men who settled here before Thomas Jefferson went into real estate speculation and bought all this region from a hard pressed French nobleman.

Baton Rouge clambers over half a hundred low hills and fades away at the outskirts into a region overrun by jungle growth. Its houses build up to the line of the pavement and are array and melancholy stands that immediately associated with the French quarter of New Orleans or with the villages of France, for that matter. Its pride is the institution of learning that occupies one end of it, for this is a university town. No more beautiful site for such an institution could be conceived, for its campus was along a military parade ground and many of its buildings were parts of the strong fort which long stood here, and which was once commanded by no less a person than Zachary Taylor, who marched from here into Mexico to fight for his flag and returned to become president.

The Mississippi sweeps a mile wide and often a hundred feet deep, beneath the Baton Rouge headland. A cross street scrambles down its cobblestoned way to a landing from which an ancient ferry boat, over the centuries which preside an ancient pilot, pushes out for the high-leaved bank opposite. Here the boat rides on the breast of a stream that looks down upon the most fertile cane fields in all the nation, planted on lands from which the river has been pushed back by the ingenious hand of man.
